

I'm not robot

Continue

Nfl scores week 10

Patrick Mahomes Steven Senne/AP Head into Week 15, the NFL playoff picture is shaping up, but it's not quite clear yet. In the AFC, Texans and Titans are fighting for South Asia, while The Bales and Steelers are fighting to make wild cards.Meanwhile, in the NFC, the NFC West is brutally close, with 11-2 49ers and 10-3 football games fighting to lead the division and 8-5 Los Angeles Rams fighting for the wild card. The Vikings are also fighting for a wild card, and the Eagles and Cowboys, both 6-7, are in an ugly battle to lead the division. All games are great from here on out. Check out our power rankings for all 32 teams below. MORE: The NFL features baltimore ravens power ratings only eight NFL teams still playing, and come Monday that number will be down to four. As we've done all season, we've simulated games of the week but we've done a few different things for the playoffs. Instead of simulating a full week at once, we rebuild each game individually to make us look better at how these games will play. We also tried to determine weather conditions based on current forecasts, and we made sure the listings reflected those in real life. Oh, and we fired the X-Buck 360. During the season we have used both the X-Buck 360 and the PlayStation 4, and of these two we had 360 better records. That's why we're back in the more successful version of Madden 25 for the playoffs. It was a mistake. Last week the game went 0-4 using the X-Buck 360, so we fired it and went back to PS4 for the second round of the playoffs. In this week's playoff game, Madden is picking up three of the four away teams. The only home team predicted to survive is New England. But if there's any sign last week, that's good news for the Colts. Saturday, January 11 New Orleans Saints (12-5) @ Seattle Sihang (13-3) In the first game of the weekend, the Saints are projected to roll to Seattle and win easily thanks to a 305-yard pass from Drew Brees - 131 of those who go to Lance Moore alone. And hey, the Hot Saints are now back after their win over the Eagles last week, who broke a five-game playoff losing streak on the road. maybe this is their year . Of course, the Colts played once before returning on December 2. Seattle, which has been rested for two weeks, won 34-7 in that game. Saints 27, newcomer 13 Indianapolis Colts (12-5) @ New England Patriots (12-4) Colts and Patriots renew their playoff rivalry, but this time it's without Peyton Manning. Instead, the Colts are led by young quarterback Andrew Luck, who last week helped engineer the second-largest comeback in NFL playoff history. According to Madden, luck is going to be a bad day - just 139 yards passing. Brady isn't supposed to have a history of going out, but his 220 yards and 2 TDs should be enough, Patriots 28, Colts 6 Sunday, January 12 San Francisco 49ers (13-4) @ Carolina Panthers (12-4) Two of the best young quarterbacks in the league are going to catch. At Carolina, but according to Madden one team will support his QB more than the other. In the simulation, the 49ers recorded 322 yards of total offense, while the Panthers racked up 240. Of those 240 yards, Cam Newton was responsible for 210 of those, including all but Carolina's 20 rushing yards. Shane Brink, on the other hand, threw for 214 yards and was backed by Frank Gore's 78 yards. 49ers 28, Panthers 10 San Diego Chargers (10-7) @ Denver Broncos (13-3) These marks the third time the Chargers and Broncos have played this season, with each team winning on the road. The last time the two played was almost exactly a month ago on January 12, when the Chargers moved to Denver, winning 27-20. In Madden's predictions, the fault doesn't lie with Peyton Manning, who is expected to throw for 344 yards and 3 TDs. Philip Rivers is not expected to put up just 281 yards as much as yards, but managed to match TD Manning's 3 in the simulated game. In the end though, it all came down to a San Diego field goal with 8 seconds remaining. Chargers 31, Brons 28 Editors' Recommendations Image: Doug Pensinger / Staff (Getty)The NFL season officially kicks off Sunday, with seven games kicking off at 1pm, followed by six more later in the day. Sunday's games, with the exception of the 8:20 p.m. game between Pittsburgh and New England that take place on NBC (Monday's games on E.P.N.) are being played on Fox and CBS. You can check out the full program broken by the game and network here. The good news is that all those games are broadcast on traditional local networks, so if you have a digital TV and antenna you should be able to get a lot of things on your TV for free. And if you have a cable subscriber you should be able to stream those channels as well at no cost using your cable log. Many major streaming services offer access to Fox and CBS. They all also offer free trials, so if you have not tried them before you can test them a drive and get the race for free in the process. Here's the rundown of options: Sling TV: $25/mo DirecTV Now: $40/monthHulu with live TV: $40/moYouTube TV: $40/moPlayStation Vue:$45/moFuboTV: $40/mo for your first month, Then $45/moBefore you sign up you want to check and make sure both Fox and CBS are provided through services in your area. While they all offer both networks, each streaming service offers access to both networks in each market. September 14, 2015 5 minutes read the comments expressed by their entrepreneurial contributors. This is my favorite season of the year -- football season, obviously. While you might think of long Sundays as well as Thursday and Monday nights spent on your couch or tailgating at your favorite stadium, professional football can also offer a great source of inspiration for entrepreneurs. Here are three customer-centric lessons that you can borrow from the NFL and put to work in your business.1. Find new ways to engage your best customers Handsome off. The NFL is a unique organization, as it cultivates interest not only in individual franchise teams, but also in the league as a whole. With RedZone's NFL best of any game and/or NFL tickets Sunday, the league keeps fans across the country engaged in football for long periods of time. Its media partners provide access to games through basic TV, cable and even online streaming. Related: 6 Things that focus the NFL on 'fan engagement' can be small business NFL training also leverage partners that create the concept of fantasy football (which you can also play through the NFL.com site), providing another means for fans to stay engaged in a wide range of teams. This additional nomination pays handsomely for the league and its owners, who are able to translate this interest into everything from more ad dollars to increased sales of goods. As an entrepreneur, look at your core business to see how you might be able to find new ways to engage your customers and spend money through new products, services, extensions, partnerships and more.2. You can make a great success with even a small amount of raving fans. One of the most successful football markets in the country is Green Bay, Weiss, a city with a population of about 106,0 people. Compare that to Los Angeles, one of America's largest cities that hasn't been able to keep a professional team in years. The reason and difference is the loyalty and enthusiasm of the fans. Having a core, loyal group of customers who rave about their company and find ways to do even more business with it can be the Holy Grail. While it's tempting to focus your marketing efforts only on finding new customers, there's a strong case for spending a lot of your marketing time and money on your existing customer base. In fact, the NFL is a real case study of engagement. From Packer fans who are able to become the team's shareholders for up to billions of dollars booming in the fantasy football industry, NFL fans in many ways feel interfering and connecting with businesses. Including their customers and having them feel some sense of extensive engagement with their business will only enhance their success. If you can strongly engage fans even in the most niche market, you can build a strong, sustainable business for years to come. Sometimes small thinking is the best path to success. Related: 4 ways to build culled trust culture from my time in Pro Football3. Non-core fans can become a big business. Despite having to focus on your core fans, some of their time should be focused on transforming non-core customers to enhance their business. One of the youngest franchises in the NFL is the Carolina Panthers. Founded in 1995, however it has created a pre-landmark customer-centric football culture that embraces all fans. The Panthers organization has the slogan of putting fans first, meaning that even if you're a link to Charlotte that's different to a team's health or in the city to For a competitor, you are still rewarded with a top shelf experience that will make you become a repeat customer, even if you are wearing signature black, blue and silver. In addition, the NFL has focused on cultivating fans in areas outside the United States. From having an international series of games played in London to exposing the game to a brand new group of potential fans to the San Francisco 49ers bringing Australian rugby star Jaryd Hayne onto their roster to help bolster interest from potential fans down underneath, the league and individual franchise know it's worth expanding the customer base by looking at non-core customers too. As an entrepreneur, the sign is with looking for new customers to turn them into raving, loyal fans. Or partner with another business to expose your brand, products and services to a new audience. Thinking outside the core in creative ways can really pay substantially, as the NFL has shown. Now you have a great excuse to watch even more pro football this year, as you might just pick up more strategies to grow and strengthen your business. Related: The strongest connections come from telling your story